The development process was a bit frustrating on my part. I realized that I had not planned the project as well as I should have. The first problem that I faced was when making the API gateway. I could not get the gateway to route correctly. Eventually I solved the problem, but progress was slow for a while. The implementation of RabbitMQ did also not go as expected. I used a good amount of time trying to implement it but, in the end, I had to drop it and go over to getting the most amount of functionality in before I was out of time.

In conclusion, I have realized the importance of thoroughly planning the project before starting the development process.